Steve Troxler
Commissioner

We are now in the heart of the growing season and I'd like to encourage consumers once again to ask for and buy North Carolina food products at the grocery store, at farmers markets and restaurants.

We are fortunate to live in the fourth most agriculturally diverse state in the country. That simply means that farmers produce a big variety of fruits, vegetables and meats right here so we have plenty of choices to enjoy.

Buying North Carolina products has many benefits, including freshness and high quality. Both have a lot to do with the fact locally grown foods travel shorter distances from the farm to table.

As we have found with a recent salmonella outbreak linked to certain types of tomatoes from Mexico and Florida, food safety and quality are important.

North Carolina tomatoes have not been linked to the salmonella cases, so consumers should feel confident in buying these locally grown fruits. The Food and Drug Administration has placed North Carolina on its list of approved states for tomato sales.

In fact, growers at the State Farmers Market in Raleigh have reported increased sales of tomatoes – a sign consumers are satisfied with the quality of home-grown commodities. This is encouraging news on all fronts and a trend I hope we see continue to grow with all North Carolina commodities.

The Got to Be NC Agriculture marketing campaign is producing results for farmers, food businesses and

State ag commissioners sound warning about rising input costs

LEXINGTON, Ky. – The long-term safety and affordability of the American food supply is threatened by skyrocketing input costs that are straining American farm families, agriculture leaders from the Southern United States said recently. They called on Congress and the federal government to address the crisis immediately.

Many farmers could go out of business if solutions aren't found, forcing the nation to import more food, the state agriculture commissioners warned.

"I've had farmers in my state come to me in tears because they don't know what they're going to do," Commissioner Ron Sparks of Alabama said during the annual conference of the Southern Association of State Departments of Agriculture in Lexington, Ky.

Costs of fuel, fertilizer and livestock feed are wiping out gains in crop prices. Livestock and poultry prices generally are flat, so higher input costs are eating into producers' bottom lines. Record oil prices are driving up the cost of virtually all farm inputs.

"Everybody feels squeezed when they have to pay more to put gas in their cars," Commissioner Terry Peach of Oklahoma said. "They have to cut back on eating out or going to the movies. But for farmers, this raises their costs to run a business, and some people are at the breaking point."

Rising expenses could put some farmers in danger of losing their homes, the agriculture commissioners said. The pressure is especially intense for young farmers who are paying for land and equipment.

"If we lose very many family farms, we'll end up importing food the way we import oil," said N.C. Commissioner Steve Troxler. "America has the highest food safety standards in the world, yet we already import food from countries with less stringent food safety rules. If we end up importing most of our food, American consumers could suffer."

Farmland preservation trust fund announces 2008 grant recipients

The Agricultural Development and Farmland Preservation Trust Fund has awarded grants totaling $7.6 million to help communities across the state protect farmland or promote agricultural enterprises, Agriculture Commissioner Steve Troxler recently announced.

"We're very pleased to be able to help communities in their efforts to preserve farmland and forest land. Our main focus is to maintain working farms and create new opportunities in agriculture," Troxler said. "We received more than 90 applications for grants requesting around $29 million in funding. This demonstrates the high degree of interest in farmland protection across the state. Although we couldn't fill every request, these grants will strengthen efforts to protect some of North Carolina's most valuable resources, thereby helping to sustain our state's leading industry."

The money will support 41 projects across the state. Below is a list of applicants by county that received grants.

Alamance

■ Alamance County received $235,000 to help it purchase a conservation easement on 120 acres of the Braeburn Farm, a livestock and poultry operation.

Ashe

■ Blue Ridge Rural Land Trust received $30,000 to assist in transaction costs associated with the purchase of an 87-acre conservation easement on the Baldwin Farm, a livestock farm.

■ High Country Conservancy received $19,000 to help in purchasing a conservation easement on 60 acres of farmland owned by the Robinson family.

Avery

■ Avery County Farmland Preservation Board was awarded $16,500 to help it establish a voluntary agricultural district pro-consumers. Our retail partners are seeing increases in sales of North Carolina products, and some stores are beginning to stock even more local products.

Many restaurants are getting in on this buy/eat local movement, too. In fact, our department hosts the Goodness Grows in North Carolina Best Dish Contest each year where restaurants compete for bragging rights and top honors by creating great tasting dishes featuring local foods. There are participating restaurants from the mountains to the coast, featuring fine dining to casual atmospheres.

Sixteen restaurants have been selected as finalists in the 2008 Best Dish Contest. They will be featuring special dishes showcasing North Carolina foods throughout the summer.

Judges will visit each restaurant and sample the dishes to determine a winner in each category. The winners will be announced later this year.

If you are interested in trying any of these for yourself, you can go to www.ncagr.com/markets/gginc/bestdish/ to find out more about the restaurants and featured dishes.

Farmers markets are also great places to buy local, and the season is getting into full swing for markets across the state. Many markets plan special events and activities that allow you to sample some of the delicious commodities available. It's a great way to help you decide which variety of peaches or corn you prefer, and it also lets you see just how fresh the fruits and vegetables are. When you want the best, it's Got to Be NC Agriculture.

AgroTips

If crops look stunted or discolored, collect soil and tissue samples for nutrient problem diagnosis.

Soil samples are normally collected before a crop is planted to assess the lime and fertilizer needs for the upcoming season. However, soil samples and matching plant tissue samples collected during the cropping season are excellent for diagnosing a wide range of nutrient problems. The best approach is to collect both soil and tissues samples from "bad" areas, and then to collect both types of samples from "good" areas. Label the samples so you know which are the "good" ones and which are the "bad" ones. Do not collect tissue samples from dead plants.

Summer is a good time to submit soil samples from lawns and gardens.

Summer is the off-season for the NCDA&CS soil testing lab, and samples can be processed quickly-usually in about ten days or less. Homeowners and landscapers are urged to submit samples at this time, but some farmers can take advantage of the off-season as well. Farmers who are maintaining cool-season pastures can submit soil samples to be ready for late summer or fall, which is an excellent time to apply phosphorus and potassium to get pasture grasses ready for winter.

N.C. tomato season opens with safe, healthy crop

For many consumers, the fact that juicy, ripe North Carolina tomatoes share the same eye-catching color of stop-lights and stop signs is good. They easily attract attention as the fruit and vegetable season gets into full swing.

But, it’s the tomato’s fresh taste that strikes the most powerful sense for many people.

“As far as I am concerned, there is nothing better than a fresh tomato sandwich in the summertime,” said Agriculture Commissioner Steve Troxler. “And North Carolinians can be assured that locally grown tomatoes are safe to eat. The Food and Drug Administration has confirmed our tomatoes are not involved with recent salmonella cases that have been linked to tomatoes from Mexico and Florida, so consumers can serve North Carolina tomatoes with confidence.”

Growers in Eastern North Carolina recently began harvesting their crops, with the major volume of tomatoes beginning in mid-July in the western part of the state.

Round, grape, cherry, plum, Roma and heirloom tomatoes can be found statewide at farmers markets and roadside stands. They are also available in retail grocery stores and restaurants during the state’s harvest season. Direct-market farms and farmers markets that sell tomatoes can be found at www.NCFarmFresh.com.

NCDA&CS secures grant to help farmers

The N.C. Department of Agriculture and Consumer Services recently secured a $136,155 Specialty Crops Block Grant from the U.S. Department of Agriculture to support the continuation and development of four statewide agriculture programs.

The grant will be split between the Good Agricultural Practices Certification Cost Share, Farm to School and Specialty Crops programs, as well as a program to increase demand for the state’s green industry crops.

“Our farmers work very hard to provide some of the highest-quality fruits, vegetables and plants available for purchase,” said Agriculture Commissioner Steve Troxler. “The programs supported by the Specialty Crops Block Grant will make our agriculture industry stronger and more competitive.”

The four programs meet the grant’s requirements that these funds enhance the competitiveness of specialty crops in North Carolina, according to Ross Williams, assistant director of marketing for the NCDA&CS. The grant will be distributed between the four projects:

- The GAP Certification Cost Share program, which began in 2007, has helped 30 farmers adhere to industry food safety standards known as Good Agricultural Practices and Good Handling Practices. The grant will provide up to $600 for a grower’s cost for an audit of the farm’s food safety program to decrease the risk of microbial contamination and increase buyer demand.

- The Farm to School initiative serves to increase the number of North Carolina schools purchasing locally grown produce. A new program will be implemented with the grant money to supply schools with N.C. food products.
- New varieties of honeydew, Asian melon, asparagus, lettuce for processing and medicinal herbs are just some of the crops the Specialty Crops partnership with N.C. State University has created to provide new sources of income for farmers. Grant money will fund marketing projects to promote new specialty crops.
- The green industry marketing campaign will promote N.C. plants through targeted advertising and public relations efforts in conjunction with the Water-Wise Works! conservation program. For more on the Water-Wise Works! program, visit its Web site at www.tarheelgardening.com.

For information on the grant or the programs it will support, contact Ross Williams, NCDA&S Marketing Division, at (919) 733-7887, ext. 237, or by e-mail at ross.williams@ncmail.net.

Three swine operations selected for animal waste conversion program

Three swine farm operations were recently chosen to receive the first round of state funding to install innovative animal waste technologies that provide greater water quality protection.

Super Soils Systems USA, Inc., Tyndall Hog & Chicken Farm, Inc., and Pope & Son – all from Sampson County – will receive funds as part of the N.C. Lagoon Conversion Program, which was established when the N.C. General Assembly adopted Senate Bill 1465 in 2007.

Officials with the N.C. Division of Soil and Water Conservation, who administer the program, made the selections based on several criteria including marketability of by-products, ease of maintenance, capability to capture or offset green house gases and affordability.

Soil and water officials who made the selections expect to select a fourth swine farm for the first round of program funding soon.

The four operations will receive up to $500,000 each. Under the program, farmers will be eligible for up to 90 percent in cost-sharing funds to convert existing swine lagoon and sprayfield systems.

The pressures on farmers have been intensified by other events beyond their control such as recent flooding in the Midwest and the deep drought in the southeastern United States last summer.

Higher producer input costs, production and transportation disruptions, and increasing demand in developing countries have combined to raise prices for food in America.

“That hurts everyone, but it’s especially hard on the poor and on our children,” Commissioner Richie Farmer of Kentucky said. “The financial strain on American farmers is an issue of public health and safety for all Americans. The federal government needs to help us find solutions that will enable family farmers to make a living while maintaining this country’s safe, abundant and affordable food supply.”

The program helps establish centralized waste collection and treatment systems to serve systems that employ new technology. Eventually, the program will establish a methane capture pilot program to help producers create more value added by-products.

“We are very excited to be moving forward to put these technologies on the ground,” said Pat Harris, director of the state Division for Soil and Water Conservation. “This program is the first of its kind in the nation. We have a lot of folks watching.”

“I believe we’re working with the caliber of swine producers that can make these innovative systems work. They have their sights to the future from both an economic and environmental perspective.”

Other groups that collaborated with the Division of Soil and Water Conservation to determine the selection criteria were the state Division of Water Quality, N.C. State University, Pamlico-Tar River Foundation, N.C. Department of Agriculture and Consumer Services, Natural Resources Conservation Service – USDA, Environmental Defense, N.C. Pork Council, Frontline Farmers and the Sierra Club.

No-till drills now available for rent in certain areas

Agriculture Commissioner Steve Troxler talks about no-till drills available for rent through certain local soil and water conservation offices at a recent press conference at the Upper Piedmont Research Station in Reidsville. The Truax Flex II-88 drill, shown behind Commissioner Troxler, can be used to more quickly renovate pastures that were damaged by last year's drought. Twenty-five drills were purchased with a $370,800 allocation approved by the Council of State in May. The drills are being distributed to 25 soil and water districts selected based on need and pasture acreage. Farmers should contact their district office about renting the drills. Districts will set the rental fees, but the range recommended by the N.C. Foundation of Soil and Water Conservation is $8-$10 per acre.
